

Warfare

We map the enemy's location with as much foresight and planning as a general going into battle; but this is a civil war against cells that have become too aggressive and are trying to stage a coup.

There will be a three-phase attack. First by land, with the scalpel leading the charge and swiftly removing the intruders' command station in one fell swoop with a border of safety around the target.

Next by air, we send invisible radioactive bombs aimed directly at ground zero for a month straight. No reprieve or rest for those combatants who have infiltrated the area.

Finally through the sea of veins, receptor-seeking chemicals find the invading cells even if they have scattered and tried to camouflage themselves in distant locations.

All this conflict will unfortunately not be without collateral damage; however, the means will be justified when, at the end of this five-year war, there is a survivor standing strong.

Danielle Wallace

