CONFESSIONS

Today I held your heart. I put my fingers around your vessels. I washed until they glowed and your blood shook out in so many shades of rust. And, yes, it's true, only the other morning I broke your spine. I shivered at your bony ridges, the color of so many whitened trees in winter. Afterwards, I carved into your wrinkles until I found that startled dark pink, and I uncurled your stiff fingers to lay my thumb on your palm, your tendons drawn under the weak October light.

I want you to know that this is beautiful your barrel chest and wasted thighs, your singing neck and painted nails, even the crusts on your skin and the hair on your upper lip. I want you to know that of those who have held you close, I have held you closer, my hands cradled around your brain or pressed warm against your ribs. In the end, I want you to know how we smell you on our skins as we walk to the locker room, how we undress, our backs turned in modesty, covering our secrets what we are naked and on the inside your body reflected in all of ours, no perfect mirror but enough to make us nervous, so awed and almost fearful at the quiet pulse within us.

