Faith Fitzgerald, MD

Dr. Fitzgerald devoted nearly four decades to educating the next generation of physicians at the University of California Davis where she joined the faculty in 1980 and was an emeritus professor who served 38 years in the Department of Internal Medicine. She served as residency program director, a position she held for nearly 20 years, chief of general medicine, vice chair for education, and the School of Medicine's first associate dean for humanities and bioethics.

An innovator in patient-centered care, she preached to colleagues and students about the importance of listening to patient's stories and experiences. "If you listen to the patient, they will tell you all you need to know," she would say.

Fitzgerald would begin pre-rounds at 3 a.m. and meet individually with patients, leaving hand-written notes in their charts. Her unique bedside manner allowed her to involve patients in decisions about their care, and she worked to gain their insights to better treat their illnesses.

"Empathy is not the same thing as kindness, sympathy, pity or understanding, it is rather knowing of someone's suffering and having the inescapable awareness that this could be me. Empathy is the most valuable gift a physician can give to their patients," Fitzgerald explained.

Known for holding herself and her students to the highest ethical and professional standards, "I try to exemplify to students the exhilaration of medicine, the honor and awesome responsibility of patient trust and the beauty of the scientific thought process," Fitzgerald said during an interview with the U.S. National Library of Medicine.

Dr. Fitzgerald was named an AΩA Robert J. Glaser Distinguished Teacher in 2002, and was a member of The Pharos Editorial Board for decades.
